DIRECTOR'S NOTE

Everything we do has a natural frequency.
All motion has a vibration and sound.

Two years ago a 'ping' on my computer alerted me to a new message. I opened it and discovered it was from Conor Guilfoyle – the jazz percussionist. It was an invitation to experiment – borne from the feeling that as he plays the drums, Conor imagines himself dancing or dance being an extension of how he creates sound from the drum kit.

Coincidentally – I had been researching sound – how it moves, how the waves and vibrations have huge influences on how we feel, behave – and how we use these energy pulses as primary ways to communicate.

And so we met, and workshopped some ideas focussing on the science behind the making of rhythm. How the dancers bodies could not only respond to sound – but they could create a unique universe and vibe that affects the rehearsal room and drives the work itself. Together we explored the fundamental frequencies of motion and the profound effects these have on the body.

In creating the piece I have had an extraordinary opportunity to play with visualising sound waves – and together with the dancers to discover how greatly sound vibration can communicate complex ideas. Live music has always played a huge part in CoisCéim's previous creations – by marrying Conor's extensive knowledge of the history of jazz music and percussion with my own body of experience of jazz and commercial dance and its roots – THE PIECE WITH THE DRUMS will deepen and add colour to our experience of the symbiotic relationship between dance and music.

I would like to say a special thank you to the dancers who have brought so much to the work, to all of the team who have supported the creation and to Conor for the 'ping'. We are delighted to be back performing at Project and we hope that you enjoy the performance and sharing the space together.
